W1D3-E02 | A SUITCASE WITH NO WHEELS | 14 min

Match seven paragraphs to seven of the eight headings. Use each selected heading once; one is extra.

A. The limits of the available record
C. A different way of looking
E. Evidence that contradicts a guess
G. A useful object becomes a puzzle

B. An argument for travelling without luggage
D. A trade brought back to life
F. A repair designed to remain visible
H. Following a geographical clue

1. At a second-hand shop, Lena found a small leather suitcase with a broken handle. Inside was a railway label bearing a town name she did not recognise. She bought the case to store drawings, but the label made her curious about its previous owner.

2. An online map produced no result for the name. An older atlas in the library did: the town had been renamed after two neighbouring districts joined. Knowing its present name allowed Lena to locate a local archive and send a photograph of the label.

3. Lena had assumed the case belonged to a wealthy holidaymaker. The archivist disagreed. Its unusual internal straps resembled those used to secure samples carried by travelling salespeople. A faded company stamp beneath the lining supported that explanation more convincingly than the attractive leather did.

4. The company had supplied buttons to clothing shops. Its representatives travelled with tiny examples of each design, arranged so buyers could compare colours quickly. The suitcase was therefore a portable showroom. Scratches inside it probably came from the metal sample boards rather than from ordinary packing.

5. No surviving document identified the person who had carried this particular case. Lena resisted adding an imaginary owner to make the story more exciting. She could explain its likely function and period of use, but a complete personal history remained beyond what the evidence justified.

6. For the handle, a craftsman suggested new leather in a slightly different shade. Matching the original perfectly would have hidden the repair. Lena preferred the contrast: anyone examining the case could distinguish its old parts from the work needed to make it usable again.

7. The case now holds Lena's drawings, as originally planned. Yet she pays more attention to ordinary objects around her. A mark beneath a chair or a handwritten note inside a book may explain how something was used, even when it reveals nothing about its monetary value.
