W8D3-E02 | THE QUEUE NOBODY COULD SEE | 14 min

Match seven paragraphs to seven of the eight headings. Use each selected heading once; one is extra.

- | | |
|--|--|
| A. A number can imply more certainty than exists | B. A fair-looking system creates resentment |
| C. The measure chosen shapes the service | D. Efficiency and fairness answer different questions |
| E. Too much detail creates a new burden | F. Individual exceptions still require human judgement |
| G. An explanation can change an interpretation | H. Why all appointments should be abolished |

1. A service centre replaced its physical queue with appointment numbers sent to visitors' phones. The waiting room became quieter, yet complaints increased. People who arrived later sometimes entered first. The system was applying different appointment categories correctly, but visitors could no longer see any intelligible relationship between waiting and being served.

2. Managers measured the average time needed to complete each case. Visitors judged whether their own wait made sense. A specialist dealing quickly with simple cases could improve the average while making a person with a complex case feel repeatedly overlooked. Neither observation necessarily disproved the other; they described different experiences of the same process.

3. Staff began telling visitors that separate teams handled different requests. A later arrival might therefore join another queue rather than move ahead in the same one. This explanation did not shorten anyone's wait. It removed an incorrect inference that had made the delay seem personally unfair.

4. Publishing the full scheduling rules proved unhelpful. Visitors had to interpret exceptions and specialist categories while already anxious about their own cases. A simpler message explained the principle and gave an estimated range. Transparency worked best when it answered the question people actually had, rather than exposing every internal procedure.

5. The centre initially displayed an exact predicted call time. Complex cases made that prediction unstable, and each revision looked like a broken promise. Replacing it with a range was less precise but more realistic. Staff also explained what would happen if a visitor had still not been called by its upper limit.
6. No scheduling rule could anticipate every need. A visitor who required language support or had difficulty remaining seated might need assistance without being moved automatically to the front. Staff needed authority to respond to the particular problem. Otherwise the apparently impartial system could produce avoidable hardship through rigid consistency.
7. The centre retained its digital queue but added questions about whether visitors understood their wait. The change recognised a limitation in the original target. Speed remained valuable, yet a fast service that people experienced as arbitrary was not fully successful. Evaluation improved once the organisation measured the quality of the experience as well as its duration.
